[From the Southern Opinion.]
Jefferson Davis as an Orator.

We find in the Southern Home Journal an elaborate article, contributed by E. A. Pollard, in which the claims of the ex-President of the Confederacy as an orator are reviewed, and considered at length. A keen analytical disquisition of the term Eloquence introduces the subject, and the writer then proceeds to notice the position occupied by Mr. Davis in the United States Senate in the days before Secession, where he reigned one of the eloquent triumvirate along with Clay, Webster, and Calhoun. Mr. Pollard says:

"The qualities of Mr. Davis as an orator were of rare and cultivated type. His person realized all that the popular imagination pictured for an orator. His thin spare figure, his almost sorrowful cast of countenance, composed however in an invariable expression of dignity, gave the idea of a body worn by the action of the mind and intellect."

"His person realized all that the popular imagination pictured for an orator. His thin spare figure, his almost sorrowful cast of countenance, composed however in an invariable expression of dignity, gave the idea of a body worn by the action of the mind and intellect."

ly. The writer recollects his glowing speech to the authorities of Richmond, when 'the President of the Six Nations' was welcomed there to accept an ensign extending from the Potomack to the Rio Grande; his animated harangue in the encampment of the Hampton Legion at Rocketts; his triumphant eloquence when, from the balcony of the Spotswood Hotel, he recounted the victory of Manassas, and spoke of the standard of the Confederacy being soon 'crowned with the flowers and fruits of enduring peace.'"

"The last public speech of Mr. Davis as the President of the Southern Confederacy was made in the African Church, Richmond. It was at a desperate period of affairs, when the Confederate Commissioners had been repulsed at Fortress Monroe, and the situation of the enemy had been made in such firm and insolent tones as could only have proceeded from the assurance of victory. The sketch proceeds.

"On this occasion Mr. Davis appeared before the public in a more austere and more majestic manner than at any time or place before. He was dressed in a simple, but dignified, manner, and he carried himself with a firm and steady gait. He was surrounded by a large number of his friends, and he was met by a throng of people who had gathered to see him. He spoke with a clear, strong, and powerful voice, and his words were heard by all who were present. He spoke of the great principles of the Confederacy, and of the great sacrifices which it had made. He spoke of the great future which lay before it, and of the great glory which it would achieve. He spoke of the great love which he had for his country, and of the great devotion which he had to its cause. He spoke of the great faith which he had in the success of the Confederacy, and of the great confidence which he had in the people of the South. He spoke of the great courage which he had, and of the great determination which he had to fight to the last. He spoke of the great honor which he had, and of the great glory which he had. He spoke of the great love which he had for his country, and of the great devotion which he had to its cause. He spoke of the great faith which he had in the success of the Confederacy, and of the great confidence which he had in the people of the South. He spoke of the great courage which he had, and of the great determination which he had to fight to the last. He spoke of the great honor which he had, and of the great glory which he had.
